Správa královských financí ve středověku. Několik poznámek k době poděbradské

Jan BOUBLÍK

NL. 66, 2011, s. 17-26

Administration of royal finance in the Middle Ages. Some remarks on the George of Poděbrady era

The royal administration of finance was covered by large number of officials, who also served - with exception for finance - in the judicial, political and diplomatic fields. Their agenda sometimes overran their duty in the financial sphere, because it has not been fully independent among other sorts of the state administration up to the 15th century. The Bohemian chamber created by Ferdinand of Habsburg in 1527 was the really first bureaucratic and distinctive financial office in the Czech lands. The mint-master's office had a specific history, represented in the 1460s by Zdeněk Kostka of Postupice, a friend of George of Poděbrady. In 1462, a new titulature (parallelly with the old one) was introduced, and Kostka was called as "the Mint-master of the Bohemian Kingdom". After the death of Zdeněk in October 1468, the name of the office was changed again in favour of the old and traditional title "the Mintmaster in Kuttenberg". Such a sudden change has not been clearly explained up to date.

O administration of finance; mint-master; George of Poděbrady (1458–1471). ○ správa financí; mincmistr; Jiří z Poděbrad (1458–1471).